The anti-torture norm and cooperation in the CIA black site programme

Keating, Vincent

Published in:
The International Journal of Human Rights

DOI:
10.1080/13642987.2016.1192534

Publication date:
2016

Document version
Peer reviewed version

Document license
CC BY-NC-SA

Citation for published version (APA):
The Anti-Torture Norm and Cooperation in the CIA Black Site Program

Vincent Charles Keating, Center for War Studies, University of Southern Denmark

This is an Accepted Manuscript of an article published by Taylor & Francis in The International Journal of Human Rights on 17 June 2016, available online at: http://dx.doi.org/10.1080/13642987.2016.1192534

Abstract

Does the interstate cooperation in the CIA rendition program imply the anti-torture norm was severely degraded in the war on terror? Most scholarship currently suggests yes, pointing to the widespread cooperation of dozens of states, including many liberal democracies, in a program designed to facilitate torture. This paper argues that this conclusion is driven primarily by a focus on outcome, that states cooperated, and ignores the process through which cooperation happened. Using the data provided in the Senate report on the CIA’s detention and interrogation program, this paper demonstrates that studying the process of cooperation instead of merely the outcome allows us to see that the anti-torture norm had continuous causal effects that are currently unrecognized in the literature. This finding not only provides a counterpoint to much of the literature on the US rendition program that focusses on the negative human rights outcomes, but also builds on research which has argued that fundamental international human rights norms were not as damaged by US conduct the war on terror as many scholars and activists had initially feared.

Keywords: torture, rendition, CIA, black sites, war on terror

Introduction

On 3 December 2014, the United States Senate Select Committee on Intelligence released its initial findings and conclusions on the CIA’s Detention and Interrogation Program. A heavily redacted executive summary of a much larger 6000-page report, it widely criticized the conduct of the CIA and their agents at various “black sites,” the colloquial name for secret CIA detention and interrogation facilities housed outside of the United States. The report was a thorough rebuke of the CIA’s black site program. Not only did it point out problems in the administration of the program and accused the CIA of misleading other departments of the US government, but in arguably the most damming finding, it found that the enhanced interrogation program was ‘not an effective means of acquiring intelligence or gaining cooperation,’ striking at the very purpose of the program itself.

1 Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, 'Committee Study of the Central Intelligence Agency's Detention and Interrogation Program', (Washington DC: United States Senate, 2014), 2. This conclusion was not completely new for the US government, having been previously echoed in the CIA Inspector General’s 2004 Special Review of Counterterrorism; for an analysis see Ruth Blakeley, 'Dirty Hands, Clean Conscience? The CIA Inspector General’s
The Senate report is the latest public blow to the CIA’s rendition program, which abducted and transported terrorist suspects to be tortured by either the United States or by other governments by proxy. It supports many of the previous investigations into the rendition program that discovered webs of cooperation between the United States and other states in the abduction, transport, and torture of terrorist suspects. This interstate cooperation in the rendition program has been highly problematic to human rights defenders as it suggests that a large number of states were complicit in a program whose primary purpose was to facilitate torture. This is particularly the case for those states involved in the CIA black site program. As some leading rendition scholars put it, ‘It was ... the establishment of CIA black sites in Europe which most clearly demonstrated the alignment of European governments with a number of abusive and illegal practices in the War on Terror.’ These sites housed not only the most high-profile prisoners, but also featured some of the worst allegations of abuse. The number of states that agreed to host these black sites where the CIA was free to torture detainees, including Poland, Romania, Lithuania, Thailand, and Afghanistan, is worrying. Additionally, some of these states are also liberal democracies – states thought most likely to uphold fundamental human rights. The participation of so many states in the rendition program, and the black site program in particular, throws up serious questions the integrity of the international prohibition against torture. If these states are freely willing to cooperate with the United States to facilitate torture, including hosting CIA facilities that tortured prisoners, then what does this say about the strength of the anti-torture norm?

It should be said that the question itself is reasonably neglected – most of the writing on the rendition program has not considered what this conduct might tell us about the state of the international anti-torture norm. The rendition program scholarship, alternatively, has by and large focused on the legal implications of the program, the domestic politics surrounding the decision making, or the plight of individual prisoners.

---

2 The conduct of the United States and its allies in the rendition program is documented extensively at The Rendition Project: http://www.therenditionproject.org.uk

5 Throughout the paper the term norm is defined in a social constructivist sense as a ‘standard of appropriate behavior.’ Martha Finnemore and Kathryn Sikkink, 'International Norm Dynamics and Political Change', International Organization 52, no. 4 (1998): 891.

When the subject of interstate cooperation arises, the existing literature primarily focusses on issues of ethical culpability. As Malinda Smith argued, ‘governments across Europe and elsewhere knew about these sites and the interrogation techniques that took place inside them and, thus, were complicit in human rights abuses.’\(^7\) Similarly, Alan Clark points out that, ‘The United States could not have succeeded in rendering so many to such brutal confinements without the direct help, and a sizable dollop of deliberate indifference, of its democratic friends and allies.’\(^8\) Others such as James D. Boys used the cooperation to point out the hypocrisy of the cooperating states.\(^9\) As Richard Aldrich put it succinctly, ‘European politicians, faced with the classic dilemmas of conducting counter-terrorism in a liberal society, have dealt with this by playing to public opinion with their criticisms of American covert activity; meanwhile they have approved discreet cooperation with the very same programmes.’\(^10\) Still other scholars noted that the United States provided financial incentives to some of these states in return for the use of the sites, only heightening the accusation that their actions were ethically suspect.\(^11\)

This framing paints a very bleak picture of the strength of the anti-torture norm, implying that these states were active and willing partners in the transport, detention, and torture of numerous individuals. If this is the case, it demonstrates a massive failure of human rights socialization over a fundamental right, torture, across states that should be the most likely to uphold these rights. Moreover, the existence of these webs of cooperation might additionally signal that these states believed that the anti-torture norm had been sufficiently weakened by the war on terror that they were unlikely to face serious repercussions for their defection. This worry, that the war on terror has damaged the international anti-torture norm, is certainly not new. In a 2005 report by then United Nations Special Rapporteur on Torture Manfred Nowak, he argued that ‘For the first time since World War II, this important consensus [on torture] of the international community seems to have been called into question by some Governments in the context of their counter-terrorism strategies.’\(^12\) The fact that many states actively cooperated with the United States in the rendition program and, in particular, the CIA black site program, only heightens this concern that states have too easily ignored fundamental human rights norms in their persecution of the war on terror.

This paper argues, conversely, that the silver lining to an otherwise depressing Senate report on the CIA black sites shows that this framing, which feeds into our perceptions of the strength of the international

---

\(^8\) Alan Clarke, Rendition to Torture, (New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press) 159 and see also 10, 14, 64-66, 62.
\(^12\) Manfred Nowak. ‘Statement of the Special Rapporteur on Torture, Manfred Nowak to the 61st Session of the U.N. Commission on Human Rights’. 4 April 2005.
anti-torture norm, is too negative. This is not to say that collusion with the United States in the black site program did not occur, or that states were simply unaware of what the United States was doing. The negative assessment found in almost all of the rendition literature is driven by a determined focus on outcome – that certain states cooperated and torture occurred. However, if we wish to truly understand what the CIA rendition program tells us about the state of the anti-torture norm, we should consider process in addition to outcome. That is, the key question needs to be transformed from solely whether these states cooperated in the black site program to include in what way did these states cooperate over time? This paper argues that although cooperation occurred, the new data contained in the Senate report allows us to analyse the process of cooperation, which suggests that the anti-torture norm had a significant causal effect in the operation of the black site program that is otherwise unrecognized in the current literature. The Senate report paints a picture not of states actively cooperating in the CIA rendition program, but states that cooperated only through continuous diplomatic pressure and financial assistance to sustain what were often volatile arrangements. Though this analysis is limited to those who participated in the black site program given the scope of the Senate report, it provides an important alternative narrative on the cooperation between states that should be taken into account for the rendition program as a whole, particularly given the high levels of secrecy that still surround the program. In other words, the Senate report gives us a glimpse into an important aspect of the secret world of rendition cooperation that appears to be more complicated and fraught with difficulty than is currently portrayed in the literature.

To make this argument this paper proceeds in three steps. First, it provides an overview of the current understanding of the rendition program to show why an argument could be made for the degradation of international human rights norms. Second, it will defend the importance of considering process, in addition to outcome, in the analysis of the strength of the anti-torture norm. Lastly, it examines state behaviour in the rendition program that suggests that the anti-torture norm had causal effects and, taking the data provided by the Senate black site report, argues that despite the ability of the CIA to procure these sites through the cooperation of many foreign governments, there is significant evidence that this cooperation with the CIA was also greatly hindered by human rights norms. As such, the state of the anti-torture norm, even with respect to 13 In addition to speaking directly to our understanding of the black site program, this argument also adds to recent literature that supports the idea that the War on Terror had far less effect on the international human rights system that initial commentators believed, see Vincent Charles Keating, 'Contesting the International Illegitimacy of Torture: The Bush Administration’s Failure to Legitimate Its Preferences within International Society’, British Journal of Politics and International Relations 16, no. 1 (2014), Jack Donnelly, 'International Human Rights since 9/11: More Continuity Than Change', in Human Rights in the 21st Century: Continuity and Change since 9/11, eds. Goodhart and Mihr (Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2011).

15 Note that the understanding of causal here is taken from the critical realist literature, which understands causation as the particular powers of ontologically real ideational forces, see Milja Kurki, Causation in International Relations: Reclaiming Causal Analysis, (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2008) 168-73,78-87.
a secret program enacted in the immediate aftermath of 9/11, was far stronger than the current literature suggests.

The Rendition Program

Due to the tireless work of activists, lawyers, journalists, and civil society organizations, it is now known that the CIA rendition program involved the cooperation of dozens of states and the detention of at least 119 persons. These detainees were abducted and sent to a variety of states for interrogation in addition to the CIA-run black sites. States across the world allegedly aided the program in a variety of ways. With respect to the United Kingdom, the Sunday Herald reported in 2005 that MI6 would pass questions on to the interrogators in states such as Morocco for use with prisoners of interest to the British government. In 2006, the government admitted that potential CIA rendition aircraft landed at British airports 73 times since 2001. British involvement was further confirmed in 2008 when a British high court found that MI5 colluded in the illegal interrogation of a British resident, Binyam Mohamed, who was rendered and tortured in Morocco. Ruth Blakeley and Sam Raphael assert that the British intelligence agencies were heavily involved in the rendition program in the form of approval of the various actions, assistance in conducting them, taking advantage of the detention by feeding in questions, and actively playing ‘good cop’ to the American ‘bad cop.’ The German external intelligence service admitted in 2006 that it was aware of the 2004 American kidnapping and detention of Khaled el-Masri, 16 months before the German government was officially informed of his mistaken arrest. Human Rights Watch additionally suggested that France, Germany and the United Kingdom obtained intelligence that arose from the torture of rendered detainees. CIA agents stated that the CIA station chief in Rome had briefed their senior Italian counterparts prior to some operations, suggesting that Italy was also allegedly aware of active rendition operations in the state. Even Sweden was implicated in the

---

17 Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Committee Study, 14.
22 Ruth Blakeley and Sam Raphael, ‘Nor Can We Be Seen to Condone It’: Analysing British Involvement in Prisoner Abuse in the War on Terror (paper presented at the 9th Pan-European Conference on International Relations, Giardini Naxos, Italy, 22-26 September, 2015) 9-13.
25 Dana Priest. 'Italy Knew About Plan to Grab Suspect'. The Washington Post, 30 June 2005, A01.
program when they handed over two men to the CIA who were then tortured in Egypt.\(^{26}\)

There was thus a clear pattern of cooperation with the rendition program across many European states. As former Secretary of State Colin Powell put it explicitly once the program became public, ‘Most of our European friends cannot be shocked that this kind of thing takes place. The fact is that we have, over the years, had procedures in place that would deal with people who are responsible for terrorist activities, or suspected terrorist activities, and so the thing that is called rendition is not something that is new or unknown to my European friends.’\(^{27}\) The Mail on Sunday published a leaked document in 2006 that corroborated implicit agreements between European governments and the United States with regards to rendition. The document noted that ‘Both sides agreed on ... increased use of European transit facilities to support the return of criminal/inadmissible aliens ... and improving co-operation in removals.’\(^{28}\) In general, Raphael et al. argue that European intelligence agencies were responsible for many tasks, including the initial detention of some suspects and subsequent interrogations while detained.\(^{29}\)

Cooperation was not just limited to European liberal democracies. The Toronto Star reported that the Canadian government was aware of and approved all rendition flights in Canadian territory. Knowledge of these flights was limited to the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service and the Prime Minister’s Office, who would approve the flights without informing other government agencies.\(^{30}\) Likewise, in late 2007 an Australian Security Intelligence Organisation agent admitted that he was present in a meeting in Pakistan with rendered detainee Mamdouh Habib before he was kidnapped by the United States and sent to Egypt to be tortured.\(^{31}\) The Australian Federal Police Commissioner subsequently admitted that they discussed the deportation of Mamdouh Habib to Egypt with US officials,\(^ {32}\) and the US government told the head of Australian Security Intelligence Organisation (ASIO) that it wanted to render Mamdouh Habib to Egypt for questioning.\(^ {33}\)

Given the amount of evidence of cooperation among so many states, it is clear why human rights activists have been so active in exposing these links and using this information to name and shame those that cooperated. But the gravity of these allegations also speaks to the potential fragility of the international norm against torture. With so many states participating in different elements of the program, can we say that the norm against torture had any causal effect whatsoever? On the face of things, the outcome of cooperation seems to suggest no, but this is a difficult question to answer because of the continued levels of secrecy surrounding the rendition cooperation. As Raphael et al have argued, the rendition program is characterized by ‘[h]igh levels of operational secrecy, combined with persistent attempts by governments involved in the programme to ensure that limited details are published.\textsuperscript{34} This problem of secrecy is what makes the new data provided by the Senate black site report important, as it provides a significant amount of detail on the history of cooperation between the United States and select partners. With this data, we can come to a better conclusion on whether there is any evidence that the anti-torture norm affected the black site program, which will inform how we think about the rendition program in general.

\(^{26}\) Alan Clarke, Rendition to Torture, 162-3.

\(^{27}\) ‘EU Has Always Known About Rendition of Suspects, Powell Reveals’. Canberra Times, 20 December, A9.

In order to make the claim that the cooperation in the black site program signals anything at all about the international anti-torture norm, there must be sufficient evidence to suggest that the participating states were aware of the program and its severity. The general public has been aware of the existence of CIA black sites since the December 2002 publication of a \textit{Washington Post} article on black sites in Afghanistan.\textsuperscript{35} The purpose of the program was made explicit in this article by an anonymous official who claimed that ‘We don’t kick the [expletive] out of them. We send them to other countries so they can kick the [expletive] out of them.’\textsuperscript{36} It was not until November 2005, however, that the media first reported that the CIA was hiding and interrogating al Qaeda captives in Eastern Europe where they were permitted to use ‘enhanced interrogation techniques.’\textsuperscript{37} A week after these revelations, \textit{The New York Times} published a classified 2004 CIA report, initially written in early 2002, that featured a list of 10 interrogation techniques for high-value detainees, including methods generally considered to constitute torture such as waterboarding.\textsuperscript{38} In terms of publicly available information, both the bulk of the program and the seriousness of the torture allegations was a secret for a period of over four years after 9/11.

Even if the cooperating states did not know exactly what was going on at the black sites, there is little possibility that the leadership of the states involved could not have foreseen that some type of abuse could take place in these facilities.\textsuperscript{39} There was no shortage of evidence throughout the four-year period when little was publicly known about the black site program that something more than simple interrogations or detention might be taking place. From the very beginning, the tone of the Bush administration signalled that the United States was willing to go beyond the normal bounds of conduct. Days after September 11, Vice President Cheney went on a major television news program to declare that, ‘We also have to work, though, sort of the dark side, if you will. We’ve got to spend time in the shadows in the intelligence world.’\textsuperscript{40} Even major spokespersons for the Democratic opposition, such as Senator John Kerry, argued that special means were necessary, arguing that ‘when you’re at war, there are some tough methods that on occasion have been

\textsuperscript{34} Sam Raphael, Crofton Black, Ruth Blakeley and Steve Kostas, \textit{Tracking Rendition Aircraft}, 4.
\textsuperscript{35} Dana Priest and Barton Gellman. 'U.S. Decries Abuse but Defends Interrogations'. \textit{The Washington Post}, 26 December 2002, A01.
\textsuperscript{36} Ibid.
\textsuperscript{37} Dana Priest. 'CIA Holds Terror Suspect in Secret Prisons'. Ibid., 2 November 2005.
\textsuperscript{39} There is some suggestion that they might have known directly. For instance, the British Secret Intelligence Service testified that they were ‘gradually aware’ of the program over time Intelligence and Security Committee, ‘Rendition’, (Norwich, 2007), 19-20.
\textsuperscript{40} ‘Meet the Press’. \textit{NBC}, 16 September 2001.
employed and are permissible that are short of torture.\textsuperscript{41} Major media outlets in 2001 suggested that both the FBI and CIA were looking into ‘trust serums’ and rough interrogation techniques.\textsuperscript{42} The media scrutiny over the treatment of prisoners at Guantanamo Bay in a 2002 \textit{Daily Mail} article gave these issues a visual form with the famous photos of the detainees in orange jumpsuits.\textsuperscript{43} Throughout 2002 several stories were printed that suggested that harsher techniques, including sleep deprivation, temperature variation, stress positions, and humiliation was being used by the United States on detainees to extract information.\textsuperscript{44} In an oft-quoted display of this changed attitude, Cofer Black, in charge of counter-terrorism at the CIA, argued before the House and Senate Intelligence Committees that ‘After 9/11, the gloves came off.’\textsuperscript{45} So even before the revelations of Abu Ghraib solidified the image of torture at the hands of US officials, there were many public indications that the Bush administration was willing to explore the boundaries of what might be deemed acceptable conduct in order to gain intelligence in the war on terror. Given the severity of torture within the international human rights system, properly socialized government officials would understand that they had a duty to ensure that no such activities were taking place in light of this ongoing discourse. Claiming that they simply had no oversight and turning a blind eye demonstrates a failure of socialization into the anti-torture norm.

There is also evidence that the black site program at times required extensive cooperation with the host states, so there is little doubt that at least some key individuals within their governments knowingly participated. This reached far beyond simply giving permission to host the black sites. According to a Council of Europe report, the CIA would file fake flight plans that would make it look like the flights were going elsewhere. For example, once flights entered Polish airspace, the aviation authority would secretly help the plane to land at an airport near the detention site without creating any public documentation. They would also file a one-way flight out of the country in order to obfuscate the real nature of the flight.\textsuperscript{46} Given the necessity of these fairly complicated cooperative arrangements, as David Forsythe put it, ‘It is unlikely that secret CIA interrogation centers could have existed in Europe ... without some knowledge and cooperation by at least some European security managers.\textsuperscript{47} This was also echoed by the European Court of Human Rights, which argued that Poland had ‘known of the nature and purposes of the CIA’s activities on its territory.’\textsuperscript{48}

\textsuperscript{45} Dana Priest and Barton Gellman, \textit{U.S. Decries Abuse}.

We are thus left with a situation where there is a great deal of information suggesting that the United States was prepared to engage in potentially torturous methods and little doubt that active cooperation occurred between the United States and the states hosting the CIA black sites. On the face of it, and in line with much of what is written in the literature about the rendition program in general, this is an exceptionally damning indictment of the cooperating states and throws up large questions about the strength of the anti-torture norm within the international human rights system. However, it rests on an analysis that is pervasive in the rendition literature, one that focusses on the outcome of the cooperation. Though the fact that cooperation occurred is an important factor in considering the strength of the anti-torture norm, the next section will argue why we need to also take into account the process through which the outcome was reached and continually negotiated.

The Importance of Process in Human Rights Norms

The focus on outcome in the rendition literature is certainly understandable because of the nature of the human rights violation. The prohibition against torture, from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights onwards, is absolute, that ‘No one shall be subjected to torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.’\textsuperscript{49} It is \textit{jus cogens} or pre-emptory, meaning that there can be no justification for the use of torture in any situation. As the Convention against Torture puts it, ‘no exceptional circumstances whatsoever ... may be invoked as a justification of torture.’\textsuperscript{50} Furthermore, this prohibition is so strong that any treaty that might accommodate torture, or even the international transfer of prisoners for the purposes of torture, would be automatically considered null and void under the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties.\textsuperscript{51} There is simply no middle ground in the understanding \textit{jus cogens} rights by definition. Since there is no possibility of derogation, from a legal perspective the process through which a government arrived at the decision to torture does not matter, since there is no possibility of excusing the action due to exceptional circumstances.

\textsuperscript{48} European Court of Human Rights, 'Secret Rendition and Detention by the CIA in Poland of Two Men Suspected of Terrorist Acts', (2014).
\textsuperscript{49} United Nations, 'The Universal Declaration of Human Rights', (1948): Article 5. \textit{Emphasis mine}
\textsuperscript{50} United Nations, 'Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment', (1984). The reason for torture being \textit{jus cogens} has been explored recently by scholars who argue that this level of prohibition arises from the liberal abhorrence to intentional suffering, see Kamila Stullerova, 'Rethinking Human Rights', \textit{International Politics} 50, no. 5 (2013), David Luban, 'Liberalism, Torture, and the Ticking Bomb', \textit{Virginia Law Review} 91, no. 6 (2005).
This legal framework that focuses solely on the binary outcome of whether a government chose to torture or not torture is replicated in much of the political writing on the subject. Major quantitative studies on whether norms have effects on torture treat the presence or absence of torture as the dependent variable, sometimes with additional nuances on the exact level of torture should it exist. More qualitative and normative arguments about torture in the war on terror also tend to stress the necessity and absoluteness of the prohibition itself, reflecting the high degree of moral revulsion at the practice. As Eugene Robinson stated in an editorial in the Washington Post, ‘the “debate” over torture is almost as grotesque as torture itself. There can be no legitimate debate about the intentional infliction of pain upon captive and defenceless human beings.’ Rosemary Foot also focusses on the jus cogens argument in her E. H. Carr Memorial Lecture, claiming that, ‘the torture convention allows for no derogation because torture has been recognized as a most profound violation of human dignity.’ As a consequence, when considering the effects on US defection from the anti-torture norm, she speaks about ‘how unrestrained many governments believe themselves to be when the most powerful state in the international system elevates counter-terrorist action above other values. Torture and other forms of abuse become commonplace and often more openly so.’ The implicit model in this statement seems to be that once the United States decides to abandon its support for the prohibition against torture, other states simply either follow suit or revert back to previous habits. The focus is on the change in the propensity to commit (or not commit) torture itself – and not on the process through which these states might negotiate such a change. This focus is also predominant in the existing literature on the rendition, as previously mentioned, which tends to focus on the torture inflicted on detainees and its lasting effects. This certainly helps to publicize the instances where torture occurred to reinforce the moral revulsion we should have at the practice, but it also treats the outcome as the most important element of investigation.

To reiterate, given the strict moral and legal prohibitions against the use of torture it is not surprising that the primary focus of scholarship and advocacy concerns uncovering and criticizing those events where torture occurred. However, the problem with focusing on torture as an all-or-nothing phenomenon – that either a state chooses to torture or aid in torture, or it does not – prevents us from painting a more complicated picture about norms concerning torture and the nature of human rights more generally. Specifically, and it hides the dynamics at play that might help us to understand the severity of the problem itself. States might decide to torture and there is no question that this is ethically indefensible. However, in line with much of the constructivist literature that stresses the importance of analysing social processes, the 55 Rosemary Foot, 'Torture: The Struggle over a Peremptory Norm in a Counter-Terrorist Era', International Relations 20, no. 2: 140.

---

56 Though this scholarship is bountiful, some of the more important works are Thomas Risse, Stephen C Ropp and Kathryn Sikkink, eds., The Persistent Power of Human Rights: From Commitment to Compliance (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2013), Thomas Risse and Kathryn Sikkink, 'The Socialization of International Human Rights Norms into way in which these states proceed is equally as important to study if we want to understand the strength of the prohibition against torture itself.

Focusing on process expands the range of analytical possibilities in state interaction regarding the prohibition against torture. For instance, at one extreme, the prohibition against torture could be socialized to the extent that it becomes a taken-for-granted norm. As such, its reproduction on the part of the state leadership becomes automatic, taken-for-granted, and habitual. The norm acts as a filter that removes certain possibilities from the table altogether. States whose leadership have internalized the anti-torture norm will simply never cooperate with the United States. This type of socialization reflects the jus cogens nature of the anti-torture norm itself, which stresses that there is no acceptable reason to engage in torture. Were these the only actors in international politics, human rights activists could sleep easily knowing that the anti-torture norm was as secure as its legal and moral prohibition reflects.

We know, however, that there are many individuals within positions of political power that are not completely habituated into the anti-torture norm. This does not mean that they ‘support’ torture per se, only that they will consider the anti-torture norm to be part of a consequentialist analysis that includes both the value they place in the anti-torture norm itself and the possibility of external sanction should their defection be discovered. Where this is the case, there are variables in play that are irrelevant where the anti-torture norm is habitually socialized.

First, there is room for these individuals to be convinced by others that the circumstances are currently such that torture might be permitted, both in terms of the arguing against the moral prohibition of torture and arguing that the current strength of the international anti-torture norm is less than they perceive it to be. Second, there is the potential for more coercive forms of interaction whereby the benefits to cooperation, or the costs to non-cooperation, are increased above their reservations over whether torture should be used.

---

59 Christopher Kultz, 'How Norms Die: Torture and Assassination in American Security Policy', Ethics and International Affairs 28, no. 4 (2014): 429. This difference between actors who have internalized the norm and those who respond to its existence echoes Jeffrey Checkel’s argument that norms both constrain and constitute the interests of actors, see Jeffrey T Checkel, 'International Norms and Domestic Politics: Bridging the Rationalist-Constructivist Divide', European Journal of International Relations 3, no. 4 (1997).

60 Reflecting the often-cited difference between logics of consequences and logics of appropriateness, see James G March and Johan P Olsen, 'The Institutional Dynamics of International Political Orders', International Organization 52, no. 4 (1998).
However, since these individuals are also aware that they reside in domestic and international political environments where the use of torture might not be appreciated, they not only need to struggle with their own internal beliefs and the potential pressures placed on them by other countries to cooperate, but with the political consequences of facing electoral or diplomatic punishment or social stigmatization should they decide to help facilitate the torture. These individuals will be open to the possibility of violating the norm, but also will act in such a way that they signal their awareness of the norm itself by either requiring incentives for cooperation or other types of diplomatic assurances. The more that they have either internalized the norm and/or believe it to be strong, the more they will require these incentives and the more difficult it will be for the United States to establish stable cooperation. Likewise, individuals that do not subscribe to the norm at all and/or believe it to be weak will be the most likely to enter into stable cooperative relationships without many inducements. In sum, a state led by individuals who have not internalized the anti-torture norm might violate it, but the violation itself does not unto itself mean that the norm has failed to have a causal effect on the outcome. To understand whether this is the case or not with respect to the CIA black sites, we need to examine the process through which cooperation occurred.

A final component necessary to understand the strength of the anti-torture norm concerns how this cooperation changes over time. If the individuals’ support for the norm is weakened through the cooperation and/or they believe the strength of the international norm itself to be weakening, then we should expect fewer problems in the cooperative relationship over time and less need for inducements – and vice versa. As such, there are two questions that can be asked that can help us to understand the strength of the anti-torture norm in light of the CIA black site programme: does the cooperation seem reasonably stable with the need for few inducements, and does the stability of the relationship increase or decrease over time?

The black site program is a particularly good case study to consider the potential effects of the international anti-torture norm since it was run in near secrecy for almost four years. Ian Hurd has already noted that secrecy allows states to temporarily avoid the costs of acting in an illegitimate manner, which can

---

61 This affects even the most powerful of states. As Jason Ralph noted in his review of The Torture Papers, the 1000 pages of legal argument demonstrate that even if the Bush administration preferred not to see itself as bound by international law, even it certainly did not ‘ignore’ it and was therefore aware of its potential consequences. Jason Ralph, ‘America’s ‘War on Terror’: Making Sense of the ‘Troubling Confusion’’, The International Journal of Human Rights 10, no. 2 (2006): 182.

63 Note that both and or are possibilities since there are two separate effects in play: 1) being partially convinced that it is the wrong thing to do and 2) the belief that negative political consequences will arise from breaking the norm. Unfortunately demarcating the causal effects of each is impossible given the data at hand, so these two effects are grouped into one category because of their similar effect.

64 This analysis of conduct over time is similar to previous discursive analyses of the overall anti-torture norm in the War on Terror, see Vincent Charles Keating, Contesting the International Illegitimacy of Torture: The Bush Administration’s Failure to Legitimate Its Preferences within International Society.

be very useful for those breaking human rights norms. But the character of the secret cooperation can also give us an indication of the state of the anti-torture norm more than can the character of open cooperation, exactlly because there are no immediate costs to breaking the norm when secrecy is available. As such, secrecy presents the best possible structural condition to break norms, only augmenting any observations of state hesitancy to cooperate with the United States.

In summary, the process of norm violation over time, particularly during periods of secrecy when states are not facing the possibility of immediate sanction, becomes as important as the violation of the norm itself if we want to understand the strength of the anti-torture norm. If these states initially cooperated freely, or did so increasingly, then we might be able to claim the possibility of a reverse cascade or reverse norm spiral.66
This result would then reinforce the perspective that we obtain if we only consider the outcome of the defections – that it represents a massive failure of human rights socialization. However, if states cooperate with a great amount of reservation such that the United States had to expend a great effort to sustain this cooperation, particularly when the program is secret, we can claim that the effect of the human rights system is much stronger than we would think had we only considered the defections themselves. With this in mind, the final section proceeds to consider the evidence from both pre-existing sources and the new information contained in the Senate report that might suggest such a causal influence.

The Causal Effect of the Anti-Torture Norm

If we consider what is known about the rendition program so far, there is some evidence that suggests the torture norm already had some influence on state behaviour. This is primarily found in attempts by all states to keep the program secret and the creation of mechanisms to ensure that they stay within the letter, if not the spirit, of the law. In this respect, the actions of the United Kingdom are reasonably representative of cooperating states.67 As Blakeley and Raphael note, the United Kingdom consistently denied their involvement and engaged in efforts to hush up any cooperation with the United States.68 This can be seen directly in the release of a classified British government document written by Irfan Siddiq of the Foreign Secretary’s Office to Grace Cassy in the Prime Minister’s Office in 2006 that seemed to advocate for measures that would try to

---

66 Regina Heller, Martin Kahl and Daniela Pisoiu, 'The 'Dark' Side of Normative Argumentation - the Case of Counterterrorism Policy', Global Constitutionalism 1, no. 2 (2012), Diana Panke and Ulrich Petersohn, 'Why International Norms Disappear Sometimes', European Journal of International Relations 18, no. 4 (2011), Ryder
1 (2009). It is not a foregone conclusion that the international anti-torture norm resisted a norm cascade as we can clearly see this has occurred in US domestic politics. Despite the revelations of the 2014 Senate report studied in this paper and its conclusion that definitively argued against torture, one Washington post-ABC News poll found that 58% of Americans believe that torture is often or sometimes justified, and 59% supported the methods used by the CIA with 53% believing that it produced information that could not be gained any other way Adam Goldman and Peyton Craighill. 'A Majority of Americans Support Harsh CIA Methods, Poll Finds'. The Washington Post, 17 December 2014, A02.

67 For a general discussion of the strategies used by cooperating states to avoid culpability in the rendition program, see reposition the debate on rendition. In it, Siddiq argues, ‘We should try to avoid getting drawn on [sic] detail, and to try to move the debate on, in as front foot a way we can, underlining all the time the strong anti-terrorist rationale for close co-operation with the US, within our legal obligations.’ When the denial strategy failed to work, elements of the United Kingdom government moved on to mitigation. The Secret Intelligence Service testified that it had provided direct assistance to the United States to facilitate the rendition operations, but that the number of renditions they aided was few and none of the prisoners were under threat of torture in the states they were deported to.

68 Ruth Blakeley and Sam Raphael, 1.

The decision to pursue secrecy and mitigation can be an effect of the international anti-torture norm. States, aware that they are breaking an important international norm, attempt to cover up their wrongdoing to avoid costs from domestic and international audiences. However, it is unlikely to be sufficient evidence unto itself as there can be other concerns driving secrecy, particularly given the often sensitive nature of intelligence operations. States could simply wish to protect their intelligence assets or be concerned that they are in violation of international norms other than one against torture.

An argument could also be made that the patterns cooperation on the ground between the United Kingdom and the United States were structured by the anti-torture norm. Blakeley and Raphael point out that the United Kingdom’s approach to detainees was driven by two principles: to avoid the possibility of having formal legal custody and to avoid any involvement with the abuse of prisoners. Within the military context, this included a policy of detaining but not arresting individuals during the Iraq campaign in an attempt to avoid legal liability. Legal scholars have also pointed out that United Kingdom attempted to avoid liability over possible treaty breaches through non-legally enforceable agreements, particularly diplomatic assurances. These patterns of behaviour, in addition to the attempts to keep the program secret, provide further evidence that the United Kingdom was reacting to an international anti-torture norm that it either saw as somewhat legitimate or feared others did. However, the evidence as it stands is reasonably circumstantial to make an assessment that the anti-torture norm had a causal effect on state behaviour.

The Senate report on the CIA black site program, despite its negative tone with respect to the program itself, provides important new information that can help us to make this assessment. It shows not only that the CIA had constant problems maintaining interstate cooperation while the program remained secret, but also

---

70 Intelligence and Security Committee, Rendition, 51-2.
71 Ruth Blakeley and Sam Raphael, 7.
72 Ruth Blakeley and Sam Raphael, 8.
74 Importantly, there is little dispute over the nature of the interstate cooperation, unlike many other elements that were strenuously objected to in the minority senate reports, see Senate Select Committee on Intelligence. 'Minority Views of Vice Chairman Chambliss Joined by Senators Burr, Risch, Coats, Rubio, and Coburn'. 20 June 2014, Senate Select Committee on Intelligence. 'Additional Minority Views of Senator Coburn, Vice Chairman Chambliss, Senators Burr, Risch, Coats, and Rubio'. 2014, Senate Select Committee on Intelligence. 'Senators Risch, Coats, & Rubio Additional Views'. 2014.
that these problems became significantly worse after the program was revealed to the public – effectively ending sustained cooperation with almost all of their partners. As such, despite the fact that many states cooperated with the CIA to host the black sites, there is little evidence that they did so easily, pointing to either their own struggles with the anti-torture norm and/or their belief that it is a strong norm that will lead them to incur political costs should the program be revealed. Given the scarcity of information concerning the process of cooperation of the states in the rendition program as a whole, this data paints a more complex picture and suggests the anti-torture norm had significant causal effects.

The first major piece of evidence suggesting that cooperation was not purely automatic concerns the number of times the CIA had to offer financial incentives to foreign governments into accepting the sites.\(^75\) The report’s conclusion suggests that ‘to encourage governments to clandestinely host CIA detention sites, or to increase support for existing sites, the CIA provided millions of dollars in cash payments to foreign government officials.’\(^76\) This fact is also reflected in the discussion of individual sites. For instance, at Detention Site Green\(^77\) the host government made requests for financial support in exchange for the continued functioning of the facility.\(^78\) When the CIA decided to create Detention Site Black in 2003, CIA Headquarters asked the CIA Station in one of the countries to ‘identify ways to support the [REDACTED] in Country [REDACTED] to ‘demonstrate to [REDACTED] and the highest levels of the [Country [REDACTED]] government that we deeply appreciate their cooperation and support’ for the detention program.’\(^79\) The CIA Station subsequently put together a multi-million dollar ‘wish list,’ to which CIA Headquarters eventually authorized several million more than what was requested for the ‘purposes of the [REDACTED] subsidy.’\(^80\)

Similarly, in the creation of what is likely Detention Site Violet the CIA ‘also offered $[REDACTED] million to the [REDACTED] to “show appreciation” for the [REDACTED] support for the program,’ which

\(^75\) Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Committee Study, 139.

\(^76\) Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Committee Study, 16.

\(^78\) Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Committee Study, 23-4.

\(^79\) Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Committee Study, 97. Similarly, in another section of the report a CIA Station is asked to ‘think big’ and create a ‘wish list’ about how CIA Headquarters could support elements of a hosting country. These subsidy payments eventually totalled in the tens of millions of dollars, some of which was delivered in boxes of one hundred dollar bills, see Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Committee Study, 140.

\(^80\) Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Committee Study, 97.
ultimately led to the approval of the expansion of the CIA facility.\textsuperscript{81} In the interim, the CIA continued to funnel money into the country, with the report stating that ‘the CIA and [REDACTED] developed complex mechanisms to [REDACTED] in order to provide the $[REDACTED] million to the [REDACTED].’\textsuperscript{82}

So there is a good deal of evidence that the CIA paid out tens if not hundreds of millions of dollars in support to governments or elements of governments in exchange for the hosting of the black sites. Moreover, CIA headquarters recognized the link between this financial support and cooperation. In 2003, they asked one CIA station to ‘advise if additional funds may be needed to keep [the facility] viable over the coming year and beyond,’ because ‘we cannot have enough blacksite hosts, and we are loathe to let one we have slip away.’\textsuperscript{83} Providing financial incentives to black site hosting governments not only occurred, but was seen as an important element in ensuring cooperation, even while the black site program was secret.

Giving money to foreign governments itself is not enough to make a claim that human rights norms were in effect. One could make an argument that the smaller states might see this simply as an opportunity to obtain side-payments for cooperative behaviour. No doubt this has some credibility. In order to suggest that the costs paid by the CIA for the maintenance of their program might have arisen from norms against torture, we need to explore the political dialogue that took place at the same time – coming both from the partner states and in the CIA’s own awareness of the problems that the anti-torture norm might create.

One of the first pieces of evidence comes from how one state, likely Poland, wanted the CIA to sign a Memorandum of Understanding covering the roles and responsibilities of the CIA, which the CIA did not sign but instead offered money in compensation. Even after the facility was operational and money had changed hands, this state still initially rejected the transfer of particular prisoners to this site, including Khalid Shaykh Muhammad. This decision was only reversed after active diplomatic intervention and an additional financial incentive of millions of dollars.\textsuperscript{84} Likewise, in the state hosting Detention Site Green, the CIA faced widespread domestic political opposition to the program even prior to any public revelations of the program and given ongoing fiscal support. The report argues that the site would have been closed much earlier if it had not been for continued lobbying by the chief of the Station.\textsuperscript{85} Finally, the mixed messages sent from the United States over whether the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) should be granted access to the detainees created tensions in the bilateral relationships between the United States and hosting states, particularly given the pressure the ICRC was putting on these governments for access.\textsuperscript{86} In sum, there are several indications in the Senate report that the these states had concerns with the program that were manifested in requesting formal agreements concerning roles and responsibilities, caution over the transfer of certain prisoners, and outright internal political opposition, at times linked to pressure from humanitarian international organizations – even though the program at this point was not known to the public.

\textsuperscript{81} Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, \textit{Committee Study}, 99.
\textsuperscript{82} Ibid.
\textsuperscript{83} Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, \textit{Committee Study}, 140. footnote 842
\textsuperscript{84} Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, \textit{Committee Study}, 74.
\textsuperscript{85} Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, \textit{Committee Study}, 23-4.
\textsuperscript{86} Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, \textit{Committee Study}, 120.
In addition to the responses of the partner states themselves, there is a good deal of evidence that members of the United States government themselves were aware of, and concerned about, the potential political effects of breaking the anti-torture norm. Several diplomatic concerns were raised over the detention sites themselves. For instance, in August 2003 a US ambassador, likely to either Romania or Lithuania, wanted to contact the State Department about the CIA detention facility because of the ‘potential impact on our policy vis-à-vis the [country’s] government.’ The US ambassador furthermore requested a high-level document that included a statement that the interrogation techniques met with legal and human rights standards. These concerns over anti-torture norms also spanned to questions of legal liability. Counterterrorism Center Legal specifically warned about potential legal action against CIA employees in states that might ‘take a different view of the detention and interrogation practices employed by [the CIA],’ arguing that there are particular countries that the CIA should avoid because of this possibility.

The United States was additionally concerned about the negative political effects that potential leaks could have on the hosting states. A report from J Cofer Black, the Director of Counterterrorism, to the Director of Central Intelligence argued in October 2001 that the probability of exposure was only to increase over time, and that this could ‘inflame public opinion against the host government,’ threatening the cooperation necessary to ensure the continuation of the facility itself. In a subsequent 2002 discussion about the rendering of Abu Zubaydah to what was eventually Detention Site Green it was noted that ‘[i]f AZ’s prescience does become known, [it is] not clear what the impact would be.’ Furthermore, when a media organization learned that Abu Zubaydah was in the state, the CIA station chief argued that any revelation would be damaging to the bilateral relations, would likely decrease the possibility that Abu Zubaydah would be allowed to remain in the country, and would decrease the possibility that the country would accept the detention of future detainees.

As it was, even though the media did not choose to reveal the location of Abu Zubaydah, the fact that the information could be revealed led to the decision to close the site. In sum, individuals within the CIA understood that there could be considerable problems generated by any potential revelation of the black site program, were worried about the legal consequences on CIA agents participating, and faced opposition and questioning from other members of the US government, all suggesting in line with the partner state behavior

---

87 Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Committee Study, 97.
88 Ibid.
89 Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Committee Study, 74.
91 Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Committee Study, 22. Insertions mine.
92 Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Committee Study, 24.
93 Ibid. Interestingly, problems caused by the mistreatment of prisoners proved to be significant in the opposite direction as well. This was confirmed in a 2004 incident when tensions arose between a host state and the CIA because some of the CIA detainees in a host state facility claimed that they could hear cries of pain coming from other detainees. A likely government official stated that the bilateral relationship was being tested by these claims which, according to the report, led the state to request the CIA to remove all CIA detainees from the country. When the CIA approached elements within the host state later in the year about the mistreatment of detainees within the facility, the state officials saw the CIA as ‘querulous and unappreciative recipients of their [REDACTED] cooperation.’ This led to the degradation in overall intelligence cooperation between the two states, and eventually the CIA detainees were transferred out of the state in 2005. Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Committee Study, 141-2.
that there was an awareness or partial internalization of the anti-torture norm that made cooperation difficult – even in the initial years of cooperation when the program between all partner states but Afghanistan was secret.

Despite the continued secrecy, these problems seemed to be only exacerbated by the torture scandals in April 2004. As such, by early 2005, the CIA was looking for a strategy out of the black site program, citing ‘unstable relations with host governments and its difficulty in identifying additional countries to host CIA detention facilities.’ With respect to one particular country, the CIA director argued that ‘Our liaison partners who host these sites are deeply concerned by [REDACTED] press leaks, and they are increasingly skeptical of the [U.S. government’s] commitment to keep secret their cooperation.... A combination of press leaks, international scrutiny of alleged [U.S. government] detainee abuse .... Is eroding our partners’ trust in U.S. resolve to protect their identities and supporting roles.’ He continued to argue that if a long-term plan was not developed, then the United States should expect most of the host countries to formally request the closure of the facilities they host, as hosting these sites had a ‘huge risk’ attached to them. At the very least, public exposure would likely prevent even existing facilities to take on additional detainees.\(^{94}\) Similarly, a March 2005 CIA talking points memo for the CIA director noted that ‘continuation of status quo will exacerbate tensions in these very valuable relationships and cause them to withdraw their critical support and cooperation with the [U.S. government].’\(^{95}\)

As the Washington Post summed up, ‘media exposure, bureaucratic fights and disputes with foreign governments had all taken a substantial toll\(^{96}\) by early 2005. This was not a program that was unproblematically accepted by the host states that had no qualms about violating the anti-torture norm. Indeed, the record provided by the Senate Intelligence Committee shows us the exact opposite – that in order to successfully operate this program the CIA had to constantly negotiate a political minefield and spend a great deal of money to secure this cooperation. All states involved, including the United States, seemed to operate in a way suggesting that they were either personally torn by violating the torture norm and/or were at least aware of the possibilities of running afoul of the diplomatic consequences, and this clearly made cooperation significantly more difficult for the United States that it would have been if the War on Terror had fundamentally undermined the anti-torture norm. Additionally, there is evidence that the United States itself was not only concerned about the potential ramifications should the program become public, but also the potentially negative consequences this could have on the states themselves and the bilateral relations with them. Even with presence of secrecy that would otherwise potentially help states to avoid the costs of acting in an illegitimate manner with respect to the anti-torture norm, the United States faced significant problems in maintaining their cooperative relationships.

The revealing of the black site program in November 2005 thus became the final nail in the coffin. The publication of the Washington Post article immediately resulted in démarches from at least two states, one of whom argued their contribution could be in jeopardy. The CIA instantly understood that there was a problem with their conduct with respect to international human right norms. A CIA cable argued that ‘if another shoe were to drop,’ then there would be ‘considerable ramifications for U.S. relations with [REDACTED] on a number of issues that depended on U.S. credibility in the area of human rights.’ In addition to potential problems arising in their general diplomatic relationships, the CIA also expected that the foreign services that helped them to conduct missions would no longer be ‘as aggressive or cooperative.’ For instance, one state that presented a formal démarche to the U.S. government was concerned about the effect that the press reports would have on radical elements within the state that might lead to increased hostility toward the hosting government. The strain that the scandal placed on the bilateral relationship was mentioned in diplomatic meetings between the two states as late as 2009, where the government of the other state stated that if future cooperation with the CIA were to happen, assurances would be needed. Officials in another state explicitly expressed their ‘deep shock and regret,’ and were upset not only in the CIA’s inability to keep the program secret, but also in the lack of forewarning for President Bush’s September 2006 public disclosure of the program. The CIA station in this state also believed that there was a serious blow to the bilateral relationship.

\(^{94}\) Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Committee Study, 150.
\(^{95}\) Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Committee Study, 151.

These concerns turned out to be well-founded. The state hosting Detention Site Black demanded and obtained the immediate closure of the site. The revelation also created wider problems in intelligence cooperation. In April 2006, one government prohibited providing information that could lead to the rendition or detention of al-Qaida or other terrorists to U.S. Government custody for interrogation, arguing that they believed the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights prohibited them from aiding or assisting these CIA operations. Even states that continued to host black sites tightened up on their cooperative behaviour, creating large problems for the CIA. For instance, the CIA could not get the necessary cooperation for one detainee, Ahmad al-Hawsawi, to go to a local hospital. This forced the CIA to seek assistance from three third-party countries to provide medical care to al-Hawasawi and four other detainees with acute medical problems, costing the CIA tens of millions of dollars. These ongoing medical issues eventually resulted in the closing of Detention Site Violet some time in 2006, with the remaining detainees transferred to Detention Site Brown. This problem in agreeing on the provision of emergency medical care also arose in another state where the CIA attempted to construct a facility. In this case, the inability to establish protocols for emergency medical care close to the site was a significant enough problem for CIA Headquarters to argue that the facility should not be activated unless this problem was solved. In the end, the CIA invested at least one hundred million dollars to

---

97 Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Committee Study, 152.
98 Ibid.
99 Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Committee Study, 153.
100 Ibid.
101 Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Committee Study, 74-5.
102 Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Committee Study, 153.
103 Ibid.
104 Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Committee Study, 154.
105 Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Committee Study, 155.
construct the new facility that was never used. Instead, press reports about the interrogation program forced the CIA to give possession of the new facility to the government of the state.\textsuperscript{106}

In an attempt to save the program given these diplomatic problems, the CIA continued to rely on large financial incentives to persuade other states to construct new sites to deal with the ‘[d]windling pool [REDACTED] partners willing to host CIA Blacksites.’\textsuperscript{107} In at least one case, the report argues that despite the fact that financial incentives had been paid to help facilitate the cooperation, the states involved were concerned not with whether the CIA holding terrorists in the facilities, but with whether or not torture would be used. The CIA eventually did not detain any individuals in this particular state.\textsuperscript{108}

In summary, after the program was made public by the \textit{Washington Post}, the problems facing the CIA in maintaining the program increased dramatically to the point that it was exceptionally difficult for the CIA, even with large resources and a clear internal belief in the value of these sites, to maintain stable cooperative relationships. Many governments immediately ceased cooperation, and those that continued were far from openly supportive. Finally, when the CIA attempted to approach new states to host sites offering similar financial incentives, at least some directly confronted them over the potential for human rights abuses. All in all, there is little evidence that the anti-torture norm became weaker over time. In fact, the evidence seems to find for the opposite conclusion – that the states reacted as if it were a strong norm, minimizing their exposure to potential allegations of defection from the norm as soon as they could and actively querying the potential for future defection for fear of being involved in human rights abuses.

\textbf{Conclusion}

There is little question that the United States and its black site partners defected from the \textit{jus cogens} anti-torture norm in their prosecution of the war on terror. Most of the literature on the black sites explores important issues surrounding this defection, including the legal disputes, the domestic politics behind these decisions, and the effect that these decisions had on the detainees who were tortured. Given this defection and the severity of the offenses, on the face of things it might seem that the war on terror had indeed done considerable harm to the right not to be tortured.

This focus on the outcome of the cooperation that led to the torture of the detainees is understandable given that there is no possibility to legally derogate from the torture norm. Since there can be no excuse for torture, the means through which it occurred is irrelevant in a legal sense. However, as this paper has argued, if we stop the analysis at this point – the recognition that cooperation occurred that facilitated torture – we fail to recognize the underlying strength of the anti-torture norm that can be seen through its causal effects in the process of cooperation between the United States and the states hosting the black sites. If we wish to know whether the conduct undermined the anti-torture norm, it is necessary to not simply consider the defections themselves, but to look into the process through which the violations occurred.

\textsuperscript{106} Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, \textit{Committee Study}, 156.
\textsuperscript{107} Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, \textit{Committee Study}, 154.
\textsuperscript{108} Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, \textit{Committee Study}, 154-5.

The recent Senate report on the CIA’s Detention and Interrogation Program, though quite damning to the CIA itself, gives us a good deal of new evidence that international human rights norms were in play and affecting outcomes from the outset of the program until its completion. In other words, despite the fact that the CIA was able to cooperate with these states to set up black sites that facilitated torturous interrogation methods, there is little evidence to suggest that the host countries unproblematically cooperated. Instead, the report suggests that the CIA constantly found itself facing difficulties in acquiring and maintaining these facilities. Importantly, even while the sites were secret, there is evidence from the conduct of the cooperating states and internal discourses in the CIA itself that all actors were worried about the potential effects of violating the anti-torture norm. Because of this fear, the CIA faced continuous diplomatic and fiscal costs to keep their facilities running. After the exposure of the black site program, cooperation became almost impossible, with existing partners breaking cooperative ties and new potential partners querying about torture directly.

Considering the process through which the defection occurred gives us a more optimistic sense of the strength of the international anti-torture norm – even when states are acting covertly. This conclusion is important not only in a better understanding of the CIA black site program, but potentially the rendition program as a whole due to the scarcity of data on the process of cooperation. Though it is entirely possible that the cooperation over the black site program is of a special kind and not representative of other cooperative arrangements, it puts forward a significant hypothesis that needs to be taken into consideration – that anti-torture norms played a significantly larger role than currently believed – absent the publication of concrete information that might suggest otherwise.

This outcome also speaks to the power of fundamental human rights norms like torture in the face an international political environment that can put pressure on states to forgo basic human rights protections in the name of security. The United States is the most powerful state in the international system and was, during the Bush administration, committed to the use of torture as a means to deal with the perceived security threats arising from terrorism. The fact that the United States was in the best structural position to convince or pressure states to comply with this new program that traded in fundamental human rights for the promise of greater security – in terms of the immediate shock and fears created by 9/11, its ability to leverage its material power, and the enjoyment of years of secrecy – yet still failed to secure stable cooperative relationships, suggests that it is very difficult for states to overcome the political effects of fundamental human rights norms. Less powerful and influential states in less favourable circumstances are likely to have even more difficulties, assuming that it would be possible at all, in obtaining cooperation to break the anti-torture norm.

This result finally reemphasizes the importance of human rights scholars and activists in the uncovering of the black site programs and the rendition networks more generally. Though this paper has taken several of them to task in their focus on outcome over process, particularly given how this can distort our perception of the strength of international human rights norms, it is clear that bringing the abuses into the light of day only magnified the effects that the anti-torture norms were having in the initial period of secrecy. Indeed, the revelation of the black site program made previously expensive and somewhat unstable cooperative relationships almost impossible to maintain.

This optimism concerning the strength of the anti-torture norm of course must be nuanced. So long as the anti-torture norm is not habituated in the leadership of all states, there exists the possibility of defection. Furthermore, a state like the United States, with bountiful resources, might still feel it worthwhile to pay significant costs if it feels utilizing torture is worthwhile. However, recognizing the hesitant and unstable cooperation faced by the United States despite continuous diplomatic pressure and financial incentives offers us a glimpse of the serious impediments that exist because of the causal effects of the norm against torture.