In this anthology, editors present the results of five years’ research work in line with two EU FP7 projects: EUROBORDERSCAPES and EUROBORDERREGIONS. The fact that the consortium of EUROBORDERSCAPES included 22 partner institutions from 17 different states, in both EU and non EU-countries is particularly noteworthy.

The editors first explain the meaning of borderscapes in their “Dedication”. This “evocative concept” is used “as a way of approaching bordering processes from specific geographical and social contexts” (p. XV). The combination of bordering and borderscape perspectives provides “a powerful link between processes of social and political transformation, conceptual change and local experience.” (p. XV)

In their introduction, the editors present recent conceptual changes in the study of borders. They emphasise that the book “aims to make a constructive contribution to debate within border studies” (p. 1) and plead for “a more complex understanding of borders by adopting a multi-disciplinary and inter-disciplinary approach”. (p. 3)

The book consists of five parts that introduce conceptual, geopolitical, social and cultural issues with regard to bordering. In the first section, “Conceptual Change in Thinking Borders”, authors from diverse disciplines (political science, social and economic geography, political geography, landscape architecture) analyse the concept of the border and various methodological approaches, as well as processes of political, social and cultural change that influence border studies. Anna Krasteva, political scientist, opens this section and explores various meanings of spaces, lines and borders. Her core thesis is that “If the borders did not exist, spaces and lines would have created them.” (p. 24). Krasteva states that “the less relevant the borders become in international relations, the more intense the research on them is.” (p.21) This links with the fact that even if borders are as old as nation states, “re/de/bordering, scaling, ordering, othering still appear fresh and inspire experimentation, creativity, innovation.” (p. 25)

In the second part, “Everyday Processes of Bordering”, representatives from the fields of political geography, history, social sciences, political sociology and political science, analyse the impact of official policies, political debates and cultural exchange on diverse border locations. Jussi Laine, a political geographer, and Miika Tervonen, a historian and social scientist, analyse perceptions of the Finnish-Russian border in the Finnish media. The authors demonstrate that the dominant picture is that of “Russia as the Problematic Other” (p.73). Feelings of superiority are wide-spread among Finns; they see their neighbour as powerful but uncivilised. Laine and Tervonen conclude that the Finnish “media has played a central role in maintaining the border by actively (re)producing historical images and narratives.” (p. 74) Other contributions in this subject area deal with the Hizbullah Memorial Museum in South Lebanon, the historical relationship between Croatian and Serbian literature in the Balkan region and with bordering and cross-bordering processes in the Croatian-Slovenian borderlands.

The third section, “Exploring Shifting Euro/Mediterranean Borderscapes” deals with particularly current issues, specifically the Euro/Mediterranean border and migration. Anthropologists, geographers, lawyers, philosophers, economic geographers and architects explore these issues from different perspectives. Using the example of the LampedusaInFestival from 2013, the anthropologist Chiara Brambilla explores the interaction between the political and aesthetical implications of the Euro/African border and migration problems. Paolo Cuttitta, a lawyer, analyses the interaction between three migration narratives: the humanitarian, the securitarian and the religious-cultural. By adopting two different perspectives, the perspective of migration controls at sea and the perspective of integration policies, Cuttitta shows how the three narratives have jointly contributed to the production and transformation of the Mediterranean borderscape.

In the fourth part, “Rebordering State Spaces: City Borders and Border Cities”, three anthropologists and one linguist deal with the socio-cultural, political and economic changes of city borders and border cities. They analyse new urban borderscapes and new understandings of cities. Anna Lazzarini, an anthropologist, concludes that the result of the enormous changes within social relationships, ways of living, moving, using space, communicating and carrying out daily functions, is “an extraordinary social, cultural and political complexity” (p. 183) of urban spaces. Catharina Miele, another anthropologist, describes the history of housing policies regarding Roma people in the city of Naples. It is her opinion that the concept of borderscapes assists the understanding of this policy of multiplication and fragmentation of borders within the European region itself. Miele highlights that the Roma people’s and other marginalised minorities’ practices of crossing, negotiating and contesting borders, demonstrate the importance of focusing on borderscapes rather than geopolitical and urban walls.

In the fifth and final section, “Cultural Production and the Emergence of New Borderscapes”, a media scientist, two linguists and an art-historian deal with bordering and borderscaping in connection with different forms of cultural production. Cristina Giudice, a contemporary art-historian, explains how contemporary artists use their works to manifest conceptual change in thinking about borders. She uses the concept of borderscape to explain identity, as well as borders, as narratives and as imaginary units.

This book’s particular strength lies in its consistent interdisciplinary character. Representatives from diverse scholarly disciplines have used the concept of borderscapes to analyse conceptual, geopolitical, social, cultural, practical and methodological issues of bordering.

For the purposes of cataloguing, indexing and development, there is an index at the end of the volume (p. 255-260). There are also a “List of Figures and Tables” (p. VII), “Notes on Contributors” with profiles of the contributing authors (p. IX-XIII) and a “List of Abbreviations” (p. XVII) at the beginning of the book.

This publication is, without a doubt, obligatory reading for all border studies’ researchers.

Katarzyna Stoklosa

Associate Professor, Department of Political Science and Public Management at the University of Southern Denmark
Centre for Border Region Studies