C. Pedagogical ideas/basic views

"Education is not the filling of a pail, but the lighting of a fire" This quote by Noble price winner William Butler Yeats summarizes my teaching philosophy. My teaching philosophy is based on the self-determination theory, as developed by Ryan and Deci (2000). According to this theory, intrinsic motivations and ownership by the students over their own learning guarantee the best learning. Intrinsic motivation and a feeling of ownership is not exclusively internal to the student, but rather exists in the nexus between the student and the learning environment. Therefore, I see it as my task as teacher to create the best circumstances for internally motivated students, and at the same time facilitate a process where self-determined behavior replaces extrinsically motivated learning behavior. To facilitate this, as a teacher I aim to give the students, first, a feeling of competence (in other words, a feeling that they are learning and that they are capable of completing the tasks at hand). Second, the student should have a sense of autonomy. When he or she feels that he or she has an influence on the learning activities and takes ownership of these activities, the student is more likely to attribute the completion of the task to him- or herself, rather than to external factors. Finally, students need a sense of relatedness: the students need to feel at ease and respected in the interaction with the teacher and other students. Extensive research has shown that by creating the condition in which students have a feeling of competence, autonomy and relatedness, the teacher creates the best conditions for the students to learn (Ryan and Deci, 2000). This approach works better than forcing the students to study, by threats, punishments, competitive pressures, strict guidelines or tangible rewards. Such measures may undermine intrinsic motivation and give students a feeling that external factors rather than their own effort lead to learning.

This philosophy guides my teaching: for the journalism students and the political science students, from the bachelor to the PhD-level, for large group lectures as well as individual supervision.
